The cellar alley

Viticulture and folk traditions make an integral of the village life. Live folklore and folk traditions belong to the cultural heritage of the local region. The wine village became popular thanks to local wine grower Lubomír Glos, who cultivated the popular variety Cabernet Moravia. As from 2007, the variety has its monument in the village.

The old days as well as the live wine presence of the village are proved by cellars and cellar lanes. The wine track through the Podluží region in the direction from Hrušky will take you through the vineyards up to the village border, to a rest point with an information panel. You will turn right and going past the railway you will get to the wine centre of the village. The cellar colonies Výmol, Zátíší and U trati create the golden cross of local wine society. The oldest lane U trati was divided into two parts by the railway built in the 40's of the 19th century. You can find there even the parish cellar, where tithes were collected.

Two colonies in the neighbourhood have an interesting origin. The ground floor and one-floor press houses of red brick in Výmol and Zátíší were built thanks to the economic crisis in the 30's of the previous century. The owner of two brick factories in Nová Ves had problems with selling the bricks and so he used them for building the cellars and press houses on purchased allotments. Then, he sold them to local wine makers. The cellars in Lipová Street are dispersed between houses and they belong to the oldest cellars in the village. The colony of cellars U myslivny is interesting for tourists.
